Champlain College in Trent University

Champlain College is the first of ten residential colleges to be constructed on the permanent campus of Trent University. It is located on the banks of the Otonabee River at the centre of the 1,500 acre campus, and next to the University Library. The College will have a membership of 350 undergraduates representing all years and all subjects, a number of graduate students, and more than thirty academic Fellows.

The College is named in honour of Samuel de Champlain, the explorer and founder of New France, the first European to explore the Trent Valley in 1615. The cornerstone of the College commemorates the 350th anniversary of Champlain's historic journey past the University site.

The College will contain study-bedrooms for 220 men undergraduates, common rooms, a library, a dining hall, a lecture hall, seminar rooms, faculty offices, a music room, rooms for a number of resident academic dons, a council chamber, and a squash court. The residential sections of the College are to be constructed on the staircase plan, eliminating long, institutional corridors, to reduce noise and to provide the privacy necessary for study.

The college was designed by Ronald J. Thom, M.R.A.I.C., of Vancouver and Toronto. It is conceived as a complete community; all aspects of student life, both academic and social, are centered in it. The normal university separation between teaching and living facilities is eliminated by placing academic offices throughout the residential area of the College. Teaching in the College, as in the whole University, will take place primarily in small tutorial and seminar groups. Academic staff will be encouraged to take a full part in the communal life of the College and undergraduates will live in the midst of an active academic community. The College will be small enough to allow wide acquaintanceship within it among faculty and students, and to offer undergraduates a centre of interest and loyalty smaller and more intimate than the larger University of which they are a part.
